Risk & Commitment

Whenever our SAR members are on call they put themselves at risk. Being part of a SAR crew should be considered an honour, but consider it carefully. Any mariner that goes to sea experiences risk and especially those that endeavour to go out and assist mariners in distress. Please consider also how you will balance your work and family obligations with the commitment expected of a SAR member. We invest a lot of training in our crew members, and our experienced coxswains and trainers will be spending a lot of their volunteer time training you. All we ask in return is your valued commitment.

As a new recruit I agree to:

- Make a minimum commitment of two years (active service) once signed off as a SAR crew
- Attend and participate in all new recruit training sessions and modules
- Be on probation for 6 months, and that I can be released of my duties at any time
- Undergo an RCMP criminal record check

Outline how you believe you can balance your work and family obligations with the commitment expected of a SAR:

Being a member of the Royal Canadian Marine Search & Rescue means:

- Over 100 hours a year plus commitment to new crew training with 100% participation
- Dedicating your time to helping and participating in community events, boating safety education, vessel safety inspections, and providing support to assist in community disasters.
- Assisting in fundraising events, vessel maintenance, facility maintenance (docks/boat houses), mentoring new members, attending unit meetings, training sessions, special weekend sessions etc.
- Ensuring that training and incident forms are submitted accurately and on time, certificates and personal information updated and accurate in the RCMSAR Management System
- A commitment to all the above to ensure safe and successful missions
